Naughty Words Actually Offend A Ship's First Mate

The attempt to throw blame upon Chester Doyle for a row which occurred last night in front of the Grill proved in the Police Court this morning to be a dismal failure, it being shown conclusively that there was nothing in the insinuation made that he had showed and jostled the three sailors who were in the dock charged with drunkenness. It was nothing but a plain case of drunk and disorderly. The men had filled up on the essence of joy and were making remarks not ordinarily heard in polite society when Doyle came along and told them to go to their ship. His advice didn't appear good to them and they told him so with more emphasis than was absolutely necessary, intimating that they would like to use the athletic officer as a punching bag.

Farther down the street they met a lieutenant whom the exhuberance of their spirits induced them to thins ought to be thrashed. Doyle morely called the patrol wagon and sent them over to the jail to cool off.

The rice bird charge was nolle pros'd; assault and battery on the woman went over until September 18, and Morimatsu pleaded guilty to the other two charges.
